Continuation of 11. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: examiner understands that the references used still teach the claim limitations. Applicant's argument regarding "Reifman does not discuss or suggest storing, printing and receiving SMS short messages. Reifman only discusses typical facsimile messages, but does not suggest that such message are SMS short messages. The messages discussed in Reifman are not SMS short messages and thus do not have the problems inherent with SMS short messages being transmitted over a wired network" has been fully considered, in response examiner would like to point out that the Werner reference has been used for teaching a SMS message being printed and stored, but since it was not explicitly stated that it can be done according to user selection, the Reifman reference has been added to show that in a fax machine the user can easily select what to do with a message, and by message this reference could include any time of message which encompass any past or future type of message that can be received and stored in the facsimile machine, which once stored the user can go to the facsimile machine and press print, for example, to execute the function.

Applicant's argument regarding "merely reciting that combining Werner and Reifman would be obvious because "doing so the user has the options of 'activities' to perform with regards to the received messages, thus making the system user-friendlier" does not suggest how or why the SMS short messages of Werner could be modified in the manner of typical facsimile messages of Reifman to perform the storing, printing and deleting functions of Reifman" has been fully considered, in response the examiner would like to point out that the secondary reference Reifman has being cited with the mere purpose of showing the teaching that if a message, no matter what, it's received and stored in a facsimile machine as stated in the Werner reference, once in storage could be easily printed or deleted by the selection of an option or button in the facsimile machine since facsimile machines does have the capability of printing every message it receives and stores as shown in Reifman, thus it would be desirable for the Werner reference's facsimile device to allow a user to select what to do with the MSM message received and not only to perform an automatic function as disclosed in the reference in paragraph [0020] and [0022].
